Course Summary

Course Description	Culture has become a major force in counseling, introducing new research and theory and, most significantly, new insights to help us understand individuals and relationships. We will engage in critical examination of some of the founding concepts of culture as well as contemporary events, using an intersectional approach to power and oppression. Cultural diversity will be addressed broadly, including but not limited to gender, race, ethnicity, immigration status, sexual identity, (dis)ability, religion, and trauma. While most of the concepts are coming from United States, we will keep in mind how this experience compares around the globe.
Description Related Courses	We will explore: – the psychology of diversity, particularly underrepresented and marginalized populations; – how to gather and interpret information about the experiences of culturally and linguistically diverse peoples; – historical and ongoing impacts of power, oppression, social marginalization and stigma, including individual and systemic influences and impact on physical and mental health;

	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> – the impact of these factors on yourself and those with whom you will interact through your life and career. – what you can do to become more multiculturally competent.
Course Goals
Projected Results	At the end of this semester, you should be able to: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Define and apply concepts in the study of human diversity, including multiculturalism, intersectionality, oppression, discrimination, privilege, and situated knowledge. 2. Evaluate psychology's relevance to diverse populations, including the role of culture on individual and social processes and outcomes. 3. Develop a critical consciousness about how identity features become shaped by socialization, power, and policy. 4. Identify and reflect on the role of social and cultural factors in your own life experience. 5. Assess personal cultural competence and develop anti-discriminatory and strength-based perspectives.

Memo

Classes that focus on cultural issues often arouse many emotions in participants. Multicultural issues are part of the core of all our identities so many of us take them seriously. You should approach the class with active curiosity and openness to learn and increase your own knowledge. Just because we are talking about sensitive issues does not mean that you should shy away from sharing your thoughts for fear of offending someone. If you feel what you want to say is genuinely coming from a non-judgmental place, please feel empowered to share.
